prized the goods within a half or third of the true avail, to the advantage of the executor, and prejudice of the wife, bairns, or creditors.

THE LORDS did also allow aliment to the wife out of her husband's moveables to the next term, albeit she liferented an annualrent, payable at the next term. See Husband and Wife.

JOHN KER against JEAN KER.

No 63.

An executor is obliged to depone both upon subjects omitted, and the wrong appretiation of those confirmed, at the instance of the executor ad omissa.

John Ker being executor-dative ad omissa et male appretiata, pursues Jean-Ker, as principal executrix, for payment, and referred the particulars to her oath. She alleged, That she had made faith at the time of the confirmation, that nothing was omitted or wrong prized, she could not be obliged to depone again. It was answered, That this was the ordinary custom, and was no more than a re-examination, and that it would not infer perjury though it were different; because, if she had any thing omitted that had come to her possession and knowledge after the inventory, or if she had then possessed it, but did not know, or remember, that it was in her possession, or in bonis defuncti, and ordinarily the prices are made by the Commissary, and but upon conjecture, and may be much better known thereafter.

THE LORDS repelled the defence, and ordained the executrix to depone.

WILLIAM MARTIN against AGNES NIMMO...

No 64.
The estimation put upon goods by the defunct himself, must be the rule, in which case, there is no place for an executor ad mala appretiata.

WILLIAM MARTIN, as executor quoad non executa et appretiata, pursues the said Agnes Nimmo, who was executrix confirmed to her husband, Abraham Pargillies. It was alleged, That he could have no right, because he was neither a creditor nor nearest of kin to the defunct; neither were the particulars libelled dolose omitted, seeing they consisted of a number of bolls of corn, which were estimated by the defunct himself to the third curn of the growing crop, and was so given up in inventory. It was replied, That the crop being then in the barn-yard, and in the defender's possession when the testament was confirmed, she knowing that they amounted to much more than the husband did estimate, was in pessimo dolo to make that inventory, and make faith thereupon, and so ought to forfeit her right, which must fall and belong to the pursuer, as executor ad omissa and male appretiata. The Lords, in hoc facti specie, did not find that the executor was in dolo being a woman, and having given up inventory by a procurator, as her husband had estimated the same, and therefore assoilzied her; but they did not decide, if she had been in dolo, that a
