

Freedom of Information Act 2000 (Section 50) Environmental Information Regulations 2004

Decision Notice

Date: 2 March 2010

Public Authority: Department for Communities and Local Government
Address: Eland House
Bressenden Place
London
SW1E 5DU

Summary

The complainant requested various pieces of information relating to communications between the public authority and members of The Royal Household. The public authority withheld all of the information held on the basis of the exemptions at sections 41 (information provided in confidence), 37(1)(a) (Communications with The Royal Household), and 40(2) (Personal data). In the event the Commissioner found that any of the withheld information fell within the scope of environmental information, the public authority additionally sought to rely on the exceptions at regulations 12(5)(d) (the confidentiality of proceedings), 12(5)(f) (the interests of the person who provided the information) and 13(1) (personal data). The Commissioner finds that most of the information held was correctly withheld on the basis of regulation 12(5)(f), and the remainder was also correctly withheld on the basis of section 41. However, he finds the public authority in breach of sections 17(1) (late reliance on an exemption from the duty to confirm or deny), 17(1)(b) (late reliance on exemptions from the duty to disclose), regulation 14(2) (late reliance exceptions from the duty to disclose).

The Commissioner's Role

1. The Commissioner's duty is to decide whether a request for information made to a public authority has been dealt with in accordance with the requirements of Part 1 of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (the "Act"). This Notice sets out his decision. The Environmental Information Regulations (EIR) were made on 21 December 2004, pursuant to the EU Directive on Public Access to Environmental Information (Council Directive 2003/4/EC). Regulation 18 provides that the EIR shall be enforced by the Information Commissioner (the "Commissioner"). In effect, the enforcement provisions of Part 4 of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (the "Act") are imported into the EIR.

The Request

2. The complainant submitted an email to the Department for Communities and Local Government (Department) on 22 February 2006. This email contained a number of requests which focused on correspondence which the public authority may have exchanged with HRH The Prince of Wales and representatives of His Royal Highness. The full text of this email is included in an annex which is appended to this Notice.
3. After some delay, the Department issued a refusal notice on 28 July 2006. It disclosed a piece of correspondence and withheld another piece of correspondence which was referred to in the disclosed correspondence on the basis of the exemption at section 37(1)(a). The Department neither confirmed nor denied (NCND) whether it held any additional information irrelevant to the requests, relying on section 37(2).
4. On 28 July 2006 the complainant asked the Department to conduct an internal review of this decision.
5. The Department informed the complainant of the outcome of the review on 06 February 2007. It upheld the original decision to withhold the single item of correspondence under section 37(1)(a) as well as the decision to rely on the NCND provision in section 37(2).
6. Following the intervention of the Commissioner (details of which are given below) the Department contacted the complainant again in March 2009. The Department confirmed that it had re-considered the balance of the public interest test and it believed that the public interest now favoured confirming that it did hold information falling within the scope of the requests. However, the Department explained that it believed that all of this information was exempt from disclosure on the basis of section 37(1)(a) and some of the information was also exempt from disclosure on the basis of sections 41(1) and 40(2). The Department also confirmed that it did not hold a list or schedule of correspondence falling within the scope of the requests and although it agreed that it could create one, it believed the contents would also be exempt from disclosure.

The Investigation

Scope of the case

7. The complainant contacted the Commissioner on 05 December 2006 due to the Department's delay in conducting an internal review as well as its refusal to provide him with the information he had requested.
8. Following discussions between the public authority and the Commissioner in March 2009 the Department confirmed to complainant that it held information falling within the scope his requests. Following this confirmation, the complainant asked the Commissioner to consider the public authority's decision to:

- Withhold information the correspondence falling within the scope of his requests on the basis of section 37(1)(a), 40(2) and 41(1); and
- The failure to provide a list and/or schedule of the correspondence which was held.

Chronology

9. On 19 February 2007 that the Commissioner contacted the Department in relation to this complaint.
10. The Commissioner also contacted the Cabinet Office in order to discuss the issues relating to this case as a number of other government departments had received similar requests seeking details of correspondence with The Prince of Wales and his Household and the Cabinet Office was involved in co-ordinating the various public authorities' responses. (The Commissioner subsequently received a number of complaints about the responses provided by these public authorities).
11. On 31 May 2007 the Department provided the Commissioner with a response to his letter of 19 February 2007. In this letter the public authority provided the Commissioner with a list of the information which it considered to fall within the complainant's requests. The Department also explained that it believed that some of this information was exempt on the basis of section 41(1) of the Act because The Prince of Wales had written in the expectation that his correspondence would be treated in confidence by the government. The Department also provided further submissions to support its application of section 37(1)(a) of the Act. The public authority also noted that the complainant had requested lists of approaches made to it and it believed that the fulfilment of these requests would involve creation of new information, something which it was not required to do as part of the Act.
12. On 8 August 2007 the Commissioner contacted the Department and asked to be provided with copies of the information falling within the scope of the complainant's requests.
13. In March 2008 representatives of the Royal Household, the Cabinet Office and the Commissioner's office met to discuss the issues raised by the various complaints the Commissioner had received involving requests for The Prince of Wales' correspondence with government departments.
14. On 7 July 2008 the Commissioner wrote to the Royal Household in order to seek further views on the application of the exemptions in these cases.
15. The Commissioner received a response from the Royal Household in November 2008.

16. In December 2008 representatives of the Royal Household, the Cabinet Office and the Commissioner's office met again in order to further discuss the issues raised by these complaints.
17. On 27 January 2009 the Commissioner contacted the Department to explain that following discussions with the Cabinet Office and the Royal Household, it was his understanding that the Department was no longer refusing to confirm or deny whether it held information falling within the scope of these requests. The Commissioner therefore asked the Department to contact the complainant and confirm to him that it did in fact hold information which fell within the scope of his requests. The Commissioner also asked the Department to provide his office with copies of the information which fell within the scope of these requests.
18. As noted above, in March 2009 the Department contacted the complainant and confirmed that it held information but considered it to be exempt from disclosure on the basis of the exemptions contained at sections 37(1)(a), 40(2) and 41(1). The Department also confirmed that its position was that it did not hold a list or schedule of correspondence falling within the scope of the requests.
19. Also in March 2009 the Department provided the Commissioner with copies of the information which it believed fell within the scope of these requests.
20. The Commissioner contacted the Department again on 23 July 2009 and asked it to clarify its position with regard to the application of the various exemptions. The Commissioner also explained that his initial view was that some of the withheld information may constitute environmental information as defined by the EIR. He therefore asked the Department to provide details of which exceptions within the EIR it would seek to rely on should the Commissioner conclude that any of the information was environmental information.
21. The Commissioner received a response to this letter from the Cabinet Office on 7 October 2009 and from the public authority on 8 October 2009. The public authority confirmed that it did not believe that any of the withheld information fell within the scope of the EIR but if it did it would be exempt from disclosure on the basis of the exceptions contained at regulations 12(5)(d), 12(5)(f) and 13(1).

Findings of fact

22. As the information in the Chronology explains the Commissioner exchanged communications about this complaint both with the Department to which the request was submitted to and also with the Cabinet Office. In some instances the Cabinet Office has provided the Commissioner with submissions on the application of a particular exemption and asked the Commissioner to consider these submissions when reaching his decision in all cases involving requests for correspondence with The Prince of Wales. The Commissioner has agreed to do so. Therefore although for consistency and ease of reference the remainder of this Notice suggests that information or a particular submission has been provided by the Department it may be the case that it was in fact provided by the Cabinet Office on its behalf.

23. At the time that this Notice is being issued the Department's position is that all of the correspondence falling within the scope of the requests is exempt from disclosure on the basis the exemptions contained at sections 37(1)(a), 40(2) and 41(1) of the Act.
24. The Department has also confirmed that although it believed that the withheld information did not constitute 'environmental information' it believed that it would be exempt from disclosure under the EIR by virtue of regulations 12(5)(d), 12(5)(f) and 13(1).
25. The Department has also confirmed that it believed that a list and/or schedule of correspondence sent by The Prince of Wales would be exempt from disclosure on the basis of sections 37(1)(a), 40(2) and 41(1) of the Act and that a list and/or schedule of information sent to The Prince of Wales would be exempt on the basis of sections 37(1)(a) and 40(2) of the Act.

Analysis

Substantive Procedural Matters – what has the complainant actually asked for?

26. Before setting out his findings in relation to whether the information requested by the complainant should be disclosed, the Commissioner has clarified the nature of the information which he considers to fall within the scope of the complainant's requests.
27. In the Commissioner's opinion, the requests submitted by the complainant can be separated into three types:
 - Requests 1 and 2 seek lists of approaches made by The Prince of Wales or his representatives to the Department;
 - Requests 3, 4, and 5 seek the number of times The Prince of Wales or his representatives contacted the Department; and
 - Requests 6 and 7 seek various internal documents and pieces of correspondence.
28. The Commissioner notes that in early responses to the complainant and submissions to him, the Department suggested that it did not hold a list of any such approaches (or indeed a record of the number of approaches) and that to provide such information would involve the creation of new information and under the Act it was not required to create new information.
29. The Commissioner's position is that where a request is made for a schedule or list of documents, even if no schedule has been compiled, if the information which would be in the schedule is held, the request can and should be complied with unless the contents of the schedule, once compiled, would also be exempt. The Commissioner originally outlined this view in decision notice FS50070854 involving a request to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Therefore in the

- circumstances of this case the Commissioner believes that, as the Department holds letters and emails from The Prince of Wales and his representatives, it is in a position to provide the complainant with a list of these approaches and confirm the number of such approaches, subject of course to the application of any exemptions.
30. As noted, the complainant's latter requests seek correspondence held by the Department. The Commissioner notes that the complainant has phrased his request in a particular way, namely 'Please provide all correspondence between the public authority and any outside organisation or individual...which relates [emphasis added] to approaches from the HRH The Prince of Wales or representatives acting on his behalf'.
 31. The Commissioner notes that in some of the submissions he received from the Department it indicated that it did not believe that correspondence sent to it by The Prince of Wales actually fell within the scope of any of the complainant's requests.
 32. The Commissioner wishes to clarify that in his opinion such a request, by seeking information which 'relates to correspondence' with the Prince of Wales or those who represent him does not exclude the actual correspondence itself. In other words these requests include correspondence between the Department and The Prince of Wales and those who represent him, as well as any information which relates to such correspondence. This is because, in the Commissioner's opinion it is clear that any request which seeks information which relates to particular correspondence also covers the correspondence itself.
 33. The Commissioner has initially considered whether the information falling within the scope of the third class of the complainant's requests – i.e. that which seeks internal documentation, correspondence and information relating to that correspondence – is exempt from disclosure on the basis of the exemptions cited by the public authority. He has then gone on to consider whether the information that would fulfil the complainant's first two classes of requests is exempt from disclosure.
 34. However, before considering the application of the exemptions the Commissioner has considered whether any of the requested information is in fact environmental information as defined by the EIR.

Is any of the requested information 'environmental'?

35. Regulation 2(1) of the EIR defines 'environmental information' as any information in any material form on:
 - '(a) the state of the elements of the environment, such as air and atmosphere, water, soil, land, landscape and natural sites including wetlands, coastal and marine areas, biological diversity and its components, including genetically modified organisms, and the interaction among these elements;

(b) factors, such as substances, energy, noise, radiation or waste, including radioactive waste, emissions, discharges and other releases into the environment, affecting or likely to affect the elements of the environment referred to in (a);

(c) measures (including administrative measures), such as policies, legislation, plans, programmes, environmental agreements, and activities affecting or likely to affect the elements and factors referred to in (a) and (b) as well as measures or activities designed to protect those elements;

(d) reports on the implementation of environmental legislation;

(e) cost-benefit and other economic analyses and assumptions used within the framework of the measures and activities referred to in (c); and

(f) the state of human health and safety, including the contamination of the food chain, where relevant, conditions of human life, cultural sites and built structures inasmuch as they are or may be affected by the state of the elements of the environment referred to in (a) or, through those elements, by any of the matters referred to in (b) and (c)'

36. The Commissioner considers that the phrase 'any information...on' should be interpreted widely in line with the purpose expressed in the first recital of the Council Directive 2003/4/EC, which the EIR enact. In the Commissioner's opinion a broad interpretation of this phrase will usually include information concerning, about or relating to the measure, activity, factor etc in question. In other words, information that would inform the public about the matter under consideration and would therefore facilitate effective participation by the public in environmental decision making is likely to be environmental information.

37. The Commissioner also finds support for this approach in two decisions issued by the Information Tribunal. The first being The Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform v Information Commissioner and Friends of the Earth (EA/2007/0072). In this case the Tribunal found:

'that the Decision Notice [in which the Commissioner has concluded that none of the requested information was environmental information] fails to recognise that information on 'energy policy' in respect of 'supply, demand and pricing' will often fall within the definition of 'environmental information' under Regulation 2(1) EIR. In relation to the Disputed Information we find that where there is information relating to energy policy then that information is covered by the definition of environmental information under EIR. Also we find that meetings held to consider 'climate change' are also covered by the definition.' (Tribunal at paragraph 27).

38. In reaching this conclusion the Tribunal placed weight on two arguments advanced by Friends of the Earth (FoE), the first being that information on energy policy, including the supply, demand and pricing issues, will often affect or be likely to affect the environment and the second that term 'environmental information' should be interpreted broadly:

'23. Mr Michaels on behalf of FOE contends that policies (sub-para (c)) on 'energy supply, demand and pricing' often will (and are often expressly designed to) affect factors (sub-para (b)) such as energy, waste and emissions which themselves affect, or are likely to affect, elements of the environment (sub-para (a)) including, in particular and directly, the air and atmosphere and indirectly (in respect of climate change) the other elements.

24. He provides by way of simple and practical example, national policy on supply, demand and pricing of different energy sources (e.g., nuclear, renewable, coal, gas) has potentially major climate change implications and is at the heart of the debate on climate change. Similarly, national policy on land use planning or nuclear power has significant effect on the elements of the environment or on factors (e.g. radiation or waste) affecting those elements.

25. Mr Michaels further argues that the term 'environmental information' is required to be construed 'very broadly' so as to give effect to the purpose of the Directive. Recognition of the breadth of meaning to be applied has been recognised by the European Court of Justice, by the High Court and by this Tribunal in Kirkaldie v Information Commissioner & Thanet District Council EA/2006/001. The breadth is also recognised in the DEFRA guidance 'What is covered by the regulations'. It does not appear, Mr Michaels argues, that the Commissioner has adopted such an approach.'

39. Moreover in reaching this conclusion the Tribunal appeared to reject BERR's arguments that there must be a sufficiently close connection between the information and a probable impact on the environment before it can be said that the information is 'environmental information'.
40. The second Tribunal decision is Ofcom v Information Commissioner and T-Mobile (EA/2006/0078) which involved a request for the location, ownership and technical attributes of mobile phone cellular base stations. Ofcom had argued that the names of Mobile Network Operators were not environmental information as they did not constitute information 'about either the state of the elements of the environment...or the factors.....that may affect those elements.'
41. The Tribunal disagreed, stating at para 31 that:

'The name of a person or organisation responsible for an installation that emits electromagnetic waves falls comfortably within the meaning of the words "any information...on....radiation". In our view it would create unacceptable artificiality to interpret those words as referring to the nature and effect of radiation, but not to its producer. Such an interpretation would also be inconsistent with the purpose of the Directive, as expressed in the first recital, to achieve "... a greater awareness of environmental matters, a free exchange of views [and] more effective participation by the public in environmental decision making...". It is difficult to see how, in particular, the public might participate if information on those creating emissions does not fall within the environmental information regime.'

42. The Commissioner has reviewed the withheld information and has concluded that some of the information constitutes environmental information because it falls within the definition in regulation 2(1). Therefore this information must be dealt with under the EIR rather than under the Act. The information that does not fall within the definition must be considered under the Act.
43. However, the Commissioner is not able to explain which parts of the withheld information he considers to be environmental, and why, in the body of this Notice without potentially revealing the content of this information. Therefore the Commissioner has included in the confidential annex, which will be provided to the public authority but not the complainant, an explanation as to which parts of the withheld information he has concluded is environmental information and why.

Exemptions and exceptions

44. Given that the Commissioner has found that some of the withheld information is environmental information and some is not, the Commissioner must consider both the exceptions provided by the EIR and the exemptions provided by the Act.
45. The Commissioner has considered the non-environmental information first, albeit that there is inevitably some cross over between the reasoning as to why the exemptions in the Act and the exceptions in the EIR may apply to the withheld information.

The requests for correspondence.

46. In this case the Commissioner has established that the public authority holds:
 - Correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales; and
 - Correspondence exchanged with representatives of The Prince of Wales.

Section 41 – information provided in confidence

47. The Commissioner has been provided with detailed submissions to support the public authority's position that correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales is exempt from disclosure on the basis of section 41 of the Act.
48. This section states that:

'41-(1) Information is exempt information if -

 - (a) it was obtained by the public authority from any other person (including another public authority), and
 - (b) the disclosure of the information to the public (otherwise than under this Act) by the public authority holding it would constitute a breach of confidence actionable by that or any other person.'

49. Therefore for this exemption to be engaged two criteria have to be met, the public authority has to have obtained the information from a third party and the disclosure of that information has to constitute an actionable breach of confidence.

Section 41(1)(a)

50. The Department has argued that correspondence sent to it by The Prince of Wales meets the first limb of section 41 because it is clearly information it received from another person. On this basis the Commissioner accepts that such correspondence, along with correspondence received by the public authority from representatives of The Prince of Wales, meets the requirements of section 41(1)(a).
51. However, the Department has also argued that the requirement of section 41(1)(a) of the Act that information be 'obtained from another person' is sufficiently broad to include information about a person, as well as information actually provided by a person. To support this approach the Department made the point that the modern law of breach of confidence (which is discussed in detail below) covers information not only obtained from a person, but also information about a person, for example a photograph.¹ On this basis the Department has argued that correspondence to The Prince of Wales from the Department also falls within the scope of section 41(1)(a) because the content of the correspondence clearly indicates what matters His Royal Highness has raised with Ministers.
52. The Commissioner recognises that deciding whether information has been 'obtained from any other person' requires an assessment of the content of information, not simply of the mechanism by which it was imparted and recorded.² However, the Commissioner does not agree with the Department's assertion that simply because information it holds is about an identifiable individual it constitutes information obtained from that person. In the Commissioner's view such an interpretation of section 41(1)(a) is too broad for two reasons.
53. Firstly, although the Commissioner accepts – for the reasons set out below – that the modern law of breach of confidence needs to be taken into account when considering whether disclosure of information would constitute an actionable breach and thus engage section 41(1)(b), he does not believe that the case law referenced by the Department is directly relevant to the engagement of section 41(1)(a). This is because the way in which section 41 of the Act is drafted means that information is not exempt simply if its disclosure would constitute an actionable breach of confidence as in common law. Rather the inclusion of section 41(1)(a) means that the Department also has to have received that information from a third party. In effect section 41 of the Act creates an additional requirement for withholding information which is confidential under the common law and it would be inappropriate simply to apply the common law test to lower the threshold of engaging section 41 of the Act.

² The Tribunal confirmed that such an approach was correct in DBERR v Information Commissioner and FoE (EA/2007/0072) – see para 78.

54. Secondly, the Commissioner believes that the approach suggested by the Department effectively represents an attempt to broaden out the basis upon which section 41 is engaged to also ensure that it offers protection to an individual's privacy regardless of whether a Department had 'obtained' information about that individual from a third party. However, in the Commissioner's view such an interpretation of section 41 is not necessary. Whilst this exemption may not always protect an individual's privacy in the way in which the Department is arguing that it should, the Act clearly offers weighty protection to an individual's privacy in the form of the exemption provided by section 40 of the Act.
55. Therefore although the Commissioner accepts that it is possible for correspondence which was created by the Department and sent to The Prince of Wales and his representatives to still meet the requirements of section 41(1)(a), whether it does in any particular case will depend upon the content of the information which was communicated.
56. In the Commissioner's opinion there has to be a significant degree of similarity to the information which the Department is sending to The Prince of Wales or his representatives and the information which His Royal Highness or those who represent him originally provided to the public authority. In the Commissioner's opinion it is not sufficient that the information is simply on the same topic. The correspondence being sent to The Prince of Wales or his representatives has to reflect the actual views or opinions His Royal Highness, or those who represent him, raised on a particular topic.
57. Having looked at the content of the correspondence falling within the scope of this case that the public authority sent to The Prince of Wales, the Commissioner accepts that some of it reflects the views of The Prince of Wales such that this correspondence meets the requirements of section 41(1)(a). In relation to the remaining contents of the correspondence, the Commissioner considers that they reflect the views and opinions of the public authority and/or the sender of the letter and do not therefore meet the requirements of section 41(1)(a).
58. The Commissioner has set out in the confidential annex which particular pieces of correspondence or parts of correspondence do not in his opinion meet the requirements of section 41(1)(a).

Section 41(1)(b)

The public authority's position on an actionable breach of confidence

59. The Department has provided the Commissioner with detailed submissions to support its position that the disclosure of the correspondence between it and The Prince of Wales would constitute an actionable breach and thus meet the requirements of section 41(1)(b). The Commissioner has summarised these submissions below and then gone on to explain his view as to whether they apply to the information which has been withheld in this case.

60. In most cases involving the application of section 41 which the Commissioner has previously considered, the requested information has been of a commercial nature rather than the more personal information which is the focus of this case. The approach usually adopted by the Commissioner in assessing whether the disclosure of commercial information would constitute an actionable breach is to follow the test of confidence set out in Coco v A N Clark (Engineering) Ltd [1968] FSR 415 (the Coco test).
61. This judgment suggested that the following three limbed test should be considered in order to determine if information was confidential:
- Whether the information had the necessary quality of confidence;
 - Whether the information was imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence; and
 - Whether an unauthorised use of the information would result in detriment to the confider.
62. In submissions to the Commissioner the Department explained why the Coco test no longer represented the law in respect of information such as The Prince of Wales correspondence which fell within the scope of this case. These submissions are summarised below.
63. The Department noted that the Coco test involved a claim in relation to commercially confidential information whereas the information which was the focus of this case, The Prince of Wales' correspondence, was essentially personal information. The public authority explained that more recent cases than Coco v Clark had considered the law of confidence and/or misuse of personal or private information in the context of Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR). Such cases included Campbell v MGN and HRH The Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd.³ The Department argued that it was the approach to the law of confidence set out in these cases, rather than in Coco that should be considered in the circumstances of this case.
64. In support of this approach the Department referenced the only High Court case to date to deal with the application of section 41 of the Act. This case involved a request submitted to the Home Office by the British Union for Abolition of Vivisection (BUAV) for applications for licences to conduct animal experimentation.
65. The Department highlighted the fact that in his judgment in this case Eady J confirmed that the Coco test was not the only test of confidence that existed and that recognition had to be given to how misuse of private information may give rise to an actionable breach of confidence and furthermore any assessment of confidence had to take into account the impact of the Human Rights Act.⁴

66. The Department drew the Commissioner's attention to a number of sections of Eady J's judgment, including:

'[28] It is clear, for example, that the law of confidence is not confined to the principles governing the circumstances in which an equitable duty of confidence will arise; nor to the specialist field of commercial secrets. An obligation of confidence can arise by reason of an agreement, express or implied, and presumably also by the imposition of a statutory duty. Nowadays, in addition, it is recognized that there is a distinction to be drawn between "old-fashioned breach of confidence" and the tort law now characterized as "misuse of private information": see e.g. per Lord Nicholls in Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] 2 AC 457 at [14] and the discussion by Buxton LJ in McKennitt v Ash [2008] QB 73, at 80 et seq., under the heading "A taxonomy of the law of privacy and confidence".

[29] [Counsel for the requester] described Coco v Clark as being "then and now the leading authority on breach of confidence". But there would seem to be traps for the unwary in placing unqualified reliance upon the case without paying due regard to what Lord Nicholls had to say about it in Campbell v MGN Ltd in the section of his speech entitled "Breach of confidence: misuse of private information".

'[32] It is thus important to bear in mind, for the present case, the broad principle, stated by Buxton LJ in McKennitt at [11], that "...in order to find the rule of the English law of breach of confidence we now have to look in the jurisprudence of articles 8 and 10." The Tribunal did not address these developments at all and thus proceeded on the basis of an incomplete understanding of the present law.'

67. The Department also noted the fact that Eady J doubted that the first bullet point of the Coco test was still applicable to the modern of law of confidence:

'[33] It is also beyond question that some information, especially in the context of personal matters, may be treated as private, even though it is quite trivial in nature and not such as to have about it any inherent "quality of confidence": see e.g. Browne v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2008] QB 103, 113-114... McKennitt v Ash... and the remarks of Lord Nicholls in Campbell v MGN Ltd... Thus, an obligation of confidentiality may sometimes arise in respect of such information merely because it is imparted as being confidential, either expressly or impliedly. Also, the law may imply an obligation on the basis that a communication has taken place in the context of an established relationship, which would itself give rise to such a duty.'

68. Indeed in his conclusion the Department highlighted the fact that Eady J suggested that only limb of the Coco test that may relevant was the second:

⁴ The Home Office v British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection and Information Commissioner [2008] EWCH 892 (QB) 25 April 2008.

[35] Another way of putting the point would be to say that the law will afford protection, sometimes, where only the second of the Coco v Clark tests is satisfied: that is to say, the right to protection arises because it is clear to those concerned that the circumstances in which the information was imparted themselves give rise to a reasonable expectation of privacy. I would prefer, however, not to be tied to Coco v Clark where it simply has no application. (It was not even cited in the Court of Appeal in McKennitt, Browne or HRH The Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2008] Ch 57).

[36]...in the light of the modern authorities there is no reason to suppose that even an “actionable” breach of confidence, where sued upon, must inevitably be founded on the formulation of Sir Robert Megarry.’

69. In light of this, the Department explained that the test of confidence not only included the traditional breach as described in Coco v Clark but also claims to prevent the misuse of information entitled to protection under Article 8 ECHR. Article 8 provides that:

‘1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society for the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.’

70. The Department highlighted the fact that the concept of ‘private life’ within Article 8(1) is a broad one, based upon the need to protect a person’s autonomy and relationships with others from outside interference. The Department argued that the right is not confined to activities which are personal in the sense of being intimate or domestic but can be extended to business or professional activities. To support this broad interpretation the public authority quoted the European Court of Human Rights case of Niemietz v Germany and also noted that this judgment confirmed that Article 8(1) was intended to protect correspondence, (i.e. the type of information which is the focus of this case):

‘[29]The Court does not consider it possible or necessary to attempt an exhaustive definition of the notion of “private life”. However, it would be too restrictive to limit the notion to an “inner circle” in which an individual may choose to live his personal life as he chooses at to exclude entirely the outside world not encompassed within that circle. Respect for private life must also comprise to a certain degree the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings. There appears, furthermore, to be no reason of principle why this understanding of the notion of “private life” should be taken to exclude activities of a professional or business nature since it is, after all, in the course of their working lives that the majority of people have a significant, if not the greatest, opportunity of developing relationships with the outside world...’ And

‘[32] In this connection, it is sufficient to note that the provision does not use, as it does for the word “life”, any adjective to qualify the word “correspondence”. And, indeed, the Court has already held that, in the context of correspondence in the form of telephone calls, no such qualification is to be made...in a number of cases relating to correspondence with a lawyer...the Court did not even advert to the possibility that Article 8 might be inapplicable on the ground that the correspondence was of a professional nature.⁵

71. Consequently, the Department suggested that a number of different circumstances may arise in which a breach of confidence could exist:
- Some claims for the misuse of private information will cover information which has the quality of confidence, and which was imparted in circumstances inconsistent with a pre-existing relationship of confidence, but which is not entitled to protection under Article 8, e.g. trade secrets. Such claims would fall within the ambit of the traditional test set out in Coco v Clark.
 - Some claims will cover private information which is disclosed in breach of Article 8 ECHR, but which was not imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence.
 - Further claims will concern information which was both confidential information in the sense that it was imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence, and information entitled to protection under Article 8 ECHR, e.g. many claims in respect of private letters such as the information which was the focus of this present case.
72. In consideration of each of these circumstances the Department noted that it was not necessary for any particular detriment to be demonstrated in order for a duty of confidence to be actionable. The public authority explained that this position was supported by the judge in Coco v Clark who questioned whether in fact detriment would always be a necessary ingredient of an actionable breach (para 421) and furthermore by the fact that in order for Article 8(1) to be engaged it was not necessary to demonstrate any detriment.
73. The Department explained that in its view the withheld information in this case was confidential information within the sense of the traditional Coco test (albeit that for the reasons set out above it believed that this was incorrect test to apply) and also constituted confidential information because it attracted the protection of Article 8(1).
74. With regard to why the information met the three limbs of the Coco test the public authority emphasised the significance of the constitutional convention that The Prince of Wales should be educated in, and about, the business of government in order to prepare him for the time when he will be the Sovereign, without that process putting at risk the political neutrality which is essential to the role and functions of the Sovereign. It is essential to the operation of the convention that His Royal Highness should be able to express views to Ministers on important issues of government and moreover should receive their views in response. This also ensures that The Prince of Wales can carry out his role as Privy Councillor, as a Counsellor of State and as next in line to the throne, whereby he also has a statutory duty under the Regency Act 1937 to act for The Queen during her absence or incapacitation. The Department argued that convention that The Prince of Wales will be informed about the business of government in order to prepare for being Sovereign can only be maintained if both His Royal Highness, and government Ministers who advise and inform him about the business of government, can be assured that their communications with each other remain confidential.

75. The Department explained that this convention is inextricably tied to the role of the Sovereign in the British constitution and the separate constitutional convention which the Sovereign has: namely to counsel, encourage and warn the Government and thus to have opinions on government policy and to express those opinions to her Ministers. However, whatever personal opinions the Sovereign may hold she is bound to accept and act on the advice of her Ministers and is obliged to treat her communications with them as absolutely confidential. Such confidentiality is necessary in order to ensure that the Sovereign's political neutrality is not compromised in case Her Majesty has to exercise her executive powers, e.g. initiating discussions with political parties in the scenario of a hung Parliament in order to ensure that a government can be formed. Consequently, The Prince of Wales must not be in a position where his position of political neutrality is compromised (or appear to be compromised) because it cannot be restored on accession to the throne. The Department argued that if correspondence between The Prince of Wales and government Ministers was routinely disclosed His Royal Highness' political neutrality would be put at risk.
76. In light of the constitutional convention relating to the Heir to Throne, the Department argued that it was clear that correspondence exchanged between the Prince of Wales and government departments had the quality of confidence: the content of such information was clearly not of a trivial nature but rather focused on the business of government. The information was clearly imparted in circumstances which had given rise to the obligation of confidence: all parties understood, because of the operation of the convention, the need to keep such communications private. Finally, the Department argued that even if detriment needed to be identified, the harm which would occur to the operation of the convention and the potential undermining of The Prince of Wales' political neutrality following disclosure of the information would constitute sufficient detriment to meet the third limb of the Coco test.
77. In relation to why the correspondence exchanged between the Prince of Wales and government departments constituted confidential information under the modern law of confidence, the Department explained that it was clear that such correspondence engaged Article 8(1) where the topic of the correspondence was of a particularly private nature of topic, but also, in light of the quoted case law above, where the correspondence reflects The Prince of Wales' opinions on matters of government business. Therefore disclosure of the correspondence would lead to a clear infringement of The Prince of Wales' right of privacy and thus constitute a breach of confidence.
78. Although section 41 of the Act is an absolute exemption and thus not subject to the public interest test contained at section 2 of the Act, the common law concept of confidence suggests that a breach of confidence will not be actionable in circumstances where a Department can rely on public interest defence.

79. The Department argued that in the circumstances of this case there was no effective public interest defence. In support of this position the Department made the following arguments:

80. Firstly, there is an inherent public interest in the preservation of confidences and their protection by law, which in itself is a weighty factor in favour of maintaining confidentiality.

81. Secondly, in the circumstances of this case there was a specific public interest in maintaining the confidentiality of The Prince of Wales' correspondence with government in order to preserve the conventions discussed above, and specifically his political neutrality. It was strongly in the public interest to ensure the preservation of conventions in order to ensure the constitution was not undermined.

82. Thirdly, it is not simply a question of whether the information is a matter of public interest, but rather whether in all of the circumstances of the case, it is in the public interest that the duty of confidence should be breached. The Department highlighted the Court of Appeal in Associated Newspapers Ltd v HRH The Prince of Wales to illustrate this point:

'[68] But a significant element to be weighed in the balance is the importance in a democratic society of upholding duties of confidence that are created between individuals. It is not enough to justify publication that the information in question is a matter of public interest. To take an extreme example, the content of a budget speech is a matter of great public interest. But if a disloyal typist were to sell as copy to a newspaper in advance of the delivery of the speech in Parliament, there can surely be no doubt that the newspaper would be in breach of duty if it purchased and published the speech.'

83. Fourthly, to justify disclosure of confidential information on the grounds of public interest, it is not sufficient that the information is simply interesting to the public. Rather, the public interest in overriding confidentiality must be one of very considerable significance, whether that be related to, for example, the proper conduct of public affairs, public health, prevention of crime etc. Disclosure must in fact be 'necessary' in order to override obligations of confidentiality with the test of necessity reflecting both the traditional test of confidence and the test for justification with Article 8 rights under the ECHR. The Department referenced the Court of Appeal in McKennitt v Ash which involved a confidence being overridden on the basis of allegations of misconduct:

'I would nevertheless accept that Mr Browne is broadly correct when he submits that for a claimant's conduct to "trigger the public interest defence" a very high degree of misbehaviour must be demonstrated'.

84. The Department argued that it was clear from the content of the correspondence – both that sent to and that received by The Prince of Wales – no such level of significance was present to meet this high threshold.

85. Fifthly, it was important not to confuse the public interest with information which the public may be interested in. To illustrate this point the Department referenced Blackburne J in his judgment at first instance in HRH The Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers:

'[118]...it is important not to overlook the fact that what may be in the public interest to know and thus for the media to publicise in exercise of their freedom of speech is not to be confused with what is interesting to the public and therefore in a newspaper's commercial interest to publish. This is particularly so in the case of someone like the claimant whose every thought and action is, in some quarters at least, a matter of endless fascination.'

86. And noted that this point was subsequently accepted by the Court of Appeal at [70]:

'As heir to the throne, Prince Charles is an important public figure. In respect of such persons the public takes an interest in information about them that is relatively trivial. For this reason public disclosure of such information can be particularly intrusive. The judge rightly had regard to this factor...'

87. Finally, the Department suggested that whatever public interest which may exist in disclosure of correspondence between the Prince of Wales and government departments could be best described as a public interest in knowing what matters of public importance The Prince of Wales raises with Ministers, and how they respond to him, in light of the access which his constitutional position affords him. However, the Department suggested that disclosure of some of the correspondence would not serve this public interest at all because it related to purely administrative issues or focused solely on purely private matters.

The Commissioner's position on an actionable breach of confidence

88. At this stage the Commissioner wishes to highlight the fact that the Department's submissions on the application of section 41 focus solely on correspondence exchanged between The Prince of Wales and government departments, in particular Ministers within those departments. Although the Commissioner agrees that information of this description falls within the scope of the complainant's requests – for the reasons set out above at the beginning of the Analysis section – he believes that the Department holds other types of information which also fall within the scope of the complainant's requests, namely correspondence with representatives of The Prince of Wales. Consequently the Commissioner has begun by considering the application of the section 41 submissions only in relation to correspondence exchanged between The Prince of Wales and government departments before moving on to consider how these arguments apply to the remainder of the information which falls within the scope of these requests.

Correspondence between The Prince of Wales and government departments

89. The Commissioner agrees with the Department that a strict and rigid following of the Coco test is not an appropriate approach to the test of confidence for the correspondence exchanged between The Prince of Wales and government departments. The Commissioner's reasoning for this mirrors the arguments highlighted by the public authority namely the recent case law which has been referenced, most notably BUAV, and also the impact of the ECHR. Therefore when considering whether personal and private information is confidential the Commissioner agrees that consideration of Article 8 ECHR as well as a consideration of Article 10 ECHR (the right to freedom of expression) in the context of the public interest defence is necessary.
90. However, the Commissioner does not believe that some of the concepts raised in Coco v Clark should be abandoned completely as they can still be useful in determining whether information of a personal and private nature is confidential. Indeed as Eady J noted in his conclusion at [35] whether information was imparted in circumstances where there was an expectation of confidence can be relevant to determining whether there would be an actionable breach if information of a private and personal nature was disclosed.
91. Therefore for information which is of personal and private nature, such as correspondence between The Prince of Wales and government departments, rather than use the three limbed test employed by Coco v Clark, the Commissioner will consider:
- Whether information was imparted with an expectation that it would be kept confidential (be that an explicit or implicit expectation); and
 - Whether disclosure of the information would infringe the confider's right of privacy as protected by Article 8(1) ECHR.
92. In relation to the first criterion the Commissioner accepts that the constitutional convention which provides that the Heir to the Throne should be educated in the ways and workings of government means that both The Prince of Wales and those he corresponded with will have had an explicit (and weighty) expectation that such communications would be confidential.
93. In reaching this conclusion the Commissioner wishes to clarify his position in relation to the scope of the constitutional convention provided to the Heir to the Throne. In the Commissioner's opinion given that the purpose of this convention is to allow the Heir to the Throne to be educated in the ways and workings of government, the only information which will attract the protective confidentiality of this convention is information which relates to The Prince of Wales being educated in the ways and workings of government. In the Commissioner's opinion this convention cannot be interpreted so widely as to encompass all of The Prince of Wales' communications with the government; for example it does not cover correspondence in which His Royal Highness may be discussing his charitable work or indeed information of a particularly personal nature. (This is not to say of course that the withheld information in this case includes examples of either class of information.)

- 94 Nevertheless, the Commissioner accepts that for communications between the parties that do not fall within his interpretation of the convention, there is still a weighty expectation that such correspondence will be kept confidential. The Commissioner finds support for such a conclusion given the established practice that communications between The Prince of Wales and government Ministers have not been disclosed or commented on by either party, regardless of the content of the correspondence. Moreover, it is the Commissioner's understanding that the Department's position is that all correspondence the Prince of Wales exchanges with government Ministers falls within the scope of the convention and thus the individuals involved in exchanging this correspondence will have had a weighty and explicit expectation that such information will not be disclosed.
- 95 In relation to the second criterion, the Commissioner agrees with the Department that in respect of Article 8(1) the term 'private' should be interpreted broadly to ensure that a person's relationships with others are free from interference. The Commissioner also accepts that matters of a business and professional nature are covered by the protection afforded by Article 8(1). Furthermore, in the quoted case reference to 'correspondence' confirms that Article 8(1) can apply to information contained within the format which is the focus of this request.
- 96 In light of this broad reading of Article 8(1) the Commissioner accepts that disclosure of correspondence exchanged between The Prince of Wales and government departments would place in the public domain details of His Royal Highness' views and opinions on a number of issues and such an action would amount to an invasion of his privacy. Thus the Commissioner accepts that disclosure of this information would constitute an infringement of Article 8(1) and would constitute an actionable breach of confidence.
97. For these reasons the Commissioner accepts that disclosure of such correspondence would constitute an actionable breach of confidence.
98. However, before he can conclude that such correspondence is exempt from disclosure by virtue of section 41, the Commissioner has to consider whether there is a public interest defence to disclosing the information, which includes an assessment of the weight that should be attributed to Article 10 ECHR.
99. As explained above the Department identified only a very general and limited public interest in disclosure of The Prince of Wales' correspondence. In the Commissioner's opinion there are a number of further public interest arguments in favour of disclosing such correspondence that have not been identified by the public authority and he has set out below what he believes these interests are. The Commissioner has then gone on to consider whether such arguments provide a sufficient public interest defence.

Additional arguments in favour of disclosing correspondence with The Prince of Wales

100. There is a public interest in disclosure of information to ensure that the government is accountable for, and transparent in, its decision making processes.

101. Moreover, there is a specific public interest in disclosure of information that would increase the public's understanding of how the government interacts with the Royal Family and the Royal Household, and in particular in the circumstances of this case, the Heir to the Throne. This is because the Monarchy has a central role in the British constitution and the public is entitled to know how the various mechanisms of the constitution operate. This includes, in the Commissioner's opinion, how the Heir to the Throne is educated in the ways of government in preparation for his role as Sovereign. In the Commissioner's opinion such an interest is clearly distinct from the prurient public interest alluded to by the Department.
102. Disclosure of this correspondence may allow the public to understand the influence (if any) exerted by The Prince of Wales on matters of public policy. If the withheld information demonstrated that the Department or government in general had placed undue weight on the preferences of The Prince of Wales then it could add to the public interest in disclosing the information.
103. Conversely, if the withheld information actually revealed that The Prince of Wales did not have undue influence on the direction of public policy, then there would be a public interest in disclosing the information in order to reassure the public that no inappropriate weight had been placed on the views and preferences of The Heir to Throne. In essence disclosure could enhance public confidence in respect of how the government engages with The Prince of Wales.
104. These two arguments could be seen as particularly relevant in light of media stories which focus on The Prince of Wales' alleged inappropriate interference in matters of government and political lobbying.
105. Linked to this argument, is the fact that disclosure of this correspondence could further public debate regarding the role of the Monarchy and particularly the Heir to the Throne. Similarly, disclosure of this correspondence could inform the broader debate surrounding constitutional reform.

Can disclosure of the correspondence with The Prince of Wales be justified on public interest grounds?

106. Before turning to the balance of the public interest the Commissioner wishes to highlight that the public interest test inherent within section 41 differs from the public interest test contained in the qualified exemptions contained within the Act; the default position for the public interest test in the qualified exemptions is that the information should be disclosed unless the public interest in withholding the information outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information. With regard to the public interest test inherent within section 41, this position is reversed; the default position being that information should not be disclosed unless the public interest in disclosure outweighs the interest in upholding the duty of confidence and therefore withholding the information.
107. In the Commissioner's opinion the introduction of the concept of privacy and the impact of ECHR into the law of confidence has not affected this balancing exercise; Sedley L J expressed such a view in LRT v Mayor of London: 'the human rights highway leads to exactly the same outcome as the older road of equity and common law'.⁶

108. Therefore in conducting this balancing exercise as well as taking into account the protection afforded by Article 8(1), consideration must also be given to Article 10 ECHR which provides that:

'1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers...

2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.'

109. The Commissioner notes that recent European Court of Human Rights judgments have highlighted the relationship between Article 10 and access to public information. In particular, the Court has recognised that individuals involved in the legitimate process of gathering information on a matter of public importance can rely on Article 10(1) as a basis upon which to argue that public authorities interfered with this process by restricting access to information.⁷

110. Turning to the various factors identified by the Department the Commissioner does not entirely accept the argument that for there to be a successful public interest defence against a breach of confidence there would always have to be an exceptional public interest in disclosure. The Commissioner's reasoning is as follows: The Information Tribunal in Derry City Council v Information Commissioner in discussing the case of LRT v The Mayor of London noted that in the first instance the judge said that an exceptional case had to be shown to justify a disclosure which would otherwise breach a contractual obligation of confidence. When hearing the case, the Court of Appeal although not expressly overturning this view, did leave this question open and its final decision was that the information should be disclosed. The Tribunal in Derry interpreted this to mean that:

- No exceptional case has to be made to override the duty of confidence that would otherwise exist;
- All that was required is balancing of the public interest in putting the information into the public domain and the public interest in maintaining the confidence.

111. Consequently in cases where the information is of a commercial nature, the Commissioner's approach is to follow the lead of the Tribunal in that no exceptional case has to be made for disclosure, albeit the balancing exercise will still be of an inverse nature.

⁶ Quoted by the Information Tribunal in Derry City Council v Information Commissioner, (EA/2006/0014).

⁷ See Kenedi v Hungary 37374/05.

112. However, in cases where the information is of a private and personal nature, the Commissioner accepts that in light of the case law referenced by the public authority, disclosure of such information require a very strong set of public interest arguments. The difference in the Commissioner's approach to such cases can be explained by the weighty protection that Article 8 offers to private information; in other words the Commissioner accepts that there will always be an inherent and strong public interest in protecting an individual's privacy. The Commissioner's believes that a potential deviation to this approach may be appropriate where the personal information relates to the individual's public and professional life, as opposed to their intimate personal or family life, and in such a scenario such a strong set of public interest arguments may not be needed because the interests of the individual may not be paramount.
113. In determining whether the correspondence which the Department holds which has been exchanged directly with The Prince of Wales relates more to His Royal Highness' professional or public life, rather than his private life, the Commissioner faces a particularly difficult dilemma given the unique position which His Royal Highness occupies. There is clearly significant overlap between the Prince of Wales' public role as Heir to the Throne and a senior member of the Royal Family and his private life; he only occupies such positions because of the family into which he was born. In the Commissioner's opinion The Prince of Wales' public and private lives can be said to be inextricably linked. Therefore for the purposes of this case, and the consideration of Article 8, the Commissioner believes that he has to adopt the position that the information which is the focus of this case can be said to more private in nature than public and thus a very strong set of public interest arguments would be needed to cited in order for there to be a valid public interest defence.
114. Before turning to whether the arguments in this case can meet such a threshold, the Commissioner wishes to make a number of comments in relation to the weight that should be attributed to the additional arguments identified by the Department in favour of non-disclosure.
115. As implied by the comments above, the Commissioner accepts the argument that there is weighty public interest in maintaining confidences. Furthermore, the Commissioner agrees that there is a significant public interest in the ensuring the convention that the Heir to the Throne can be instructed in the business of government is not undermined; it would clearly not be in the public interest if the Heir to Throne and future Monarch appeared to be politically partisan. The Commissioner of course also agrees that there is a clear and important distinction between disclosure of information which the public would be interested in and disclosure of information which is genuinely in the public interest.
116. However, given the number of public interest arguments in favour of disclosure that the Commissioner has identified, he is of the perhaps unsurprising opinion that the benefit of disclosing correspondence the public authority holds with The Prince of Wales should not be summarily dismissed in the fashion implied by the Department. Rather the arguments identified by the Commissioner touch directly on many, if not all, of the central public interest arguments underpinning the Act, namely ensuring that public authorities are accountable for and transparent in their actions; furthering public debate; improving confidence in decisions taken by public authorities. Furthermore, the specific arguments relevant to this case in relation to The Prince of Wales' relationship with government Ministers deserves to be given particular weight.

117. Nevertheless, the Commissioner has to remember that disclosure of such information would require an exceptional set of public interest arguments and disclosure would have to be justified by the content of the withheld information itself not simply on the basis of generic or abstract public interest arguments.
118. The Commissioner has reviewed the content of the relevant correspondence carefully and he has reached the conclusion that despite the weight of the public interest arguments in favour of disclosure, the content does not present an exceptional reason or reasons for this correspondence to be disclosed. Consequently, the Commissioner has concluded that there would not be a public interest defence if the correspondence that falls within the scope of section 41 were disclosed.

Correspondence with representatives of The Prince of Wales and the Department.

119. The Commissioner recognises that the nature of the correspondence the Department exchanged with The Prince of Wales clearly differs from the nature of correspondence exchanged with His Royal Highness' representatives in some key ways: correspondence in the first category is exchanged between the Heir to the Throne and government Ministers; correspondence falling within the second category cannot necessarily be said to have been exchanged at such a high level of government or with actual members of The Royal Family.
120. However in terms of the application of section 41(1)(b) the Commissioner has established that a significant number of documents that the public authority exchanged with representatives of The Prince of Wales include references, either directly or indirectly, to the views and opinions of His Royal Highness. Furthermore, the Commissioner understands that The Prince of Wales' Household is, in essence, taken to be an extension of His Royal Highness; when a member of the Household sends a letter to a government department it is understood that such a letter is essentially being sent on behalf of The Prince of Wales.
121. Therefore on the basis of these two factors, for such pieces of correspondence, even although they are not sent directly by or to The Prince of Wales, the Commissioner believes that it is correct to treat such information as personal and private in nature. That is to say, such correspondence is personal and private to The Prince of Wales. Consequently for such information the, the Commissioner believes that the following test should again be considered:
- Whether information was imparted with an expectation that it would be kept confidential (be that an explicit or implicit expectation); and

- Whether disclosure of the information would infringe the confider's right of privacy as protected by Article 8(1) ECHR.
122. The Commissioner accepts that information exchanged between representatives of The Prince of Wales and government departments is exchanged by both parties with an understanding that this information will be kept confidential. The Commissioner finds support for such a conclusion in the fact that The Prince of Wales and His Royal Highness' Household are said to be indistinguishable and as set out above it is established practice that correspondence between The Prince of Wales and government departments is not disclosed or commented on.
123. Given that this correspondence includes The Prince of Wales' views and opinions, the Commissioner believes that it is relevant to consider the His Royal Highness' right of privacy. For the reasons set out above the Commissioner believes that disclosure of correspondence containing such information would infringe His Royal Highness' right of privacy and thus would constitute an actionable breach of confidence. Similarly for the reasons set out above the Commissioner believes that there would not be a public interest defence if such information was disclosed.
124. However, the Commissioner has established that not all of the correspondence exchanged between the public authority and The Prince of Wales' representatives includes the views and opinions of His Royal Highness and thus not all of the information contained in such correspondence is of a strictly personal and private nature. For example, the Department holds correspondence exchanged with representatives of The Prince of Wales that although discussing matters of substance are of an administrative nature. For such information the Commissioner believes that the test of confidence which should be applied is the first two limbs of the Coco test:
- Whether the information had the necessary quality of confidence; and
 - Whether the information was imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence.
125. The Commissioner believes that information will have the necessary quality of confidence if it is not otherwise accessible and it is more than trivial. Information which is known only a limited number of individuals will not be regarded as being generally accessible, though it will be if it has been disseminated to the general public. Information which is of importance to the confider should not be considered as trivial.
126. The Commissioner has reviewed the remaining correspondence in this case and accepts that all of this information has the quality of confidence; it is clearly correspondence which focuses on matters of substance, is not generally available and is of importance to the confider.
127. For the reasons set out above, the Commissioner is satisfied that the correspondence the public authority exchanged with the representatives of The Prince of Wales was provided in circumstances in which the confider expected it to be kept confidential.

128. For these reasons the Commissioner accepts that disclosure of the remaining correspondence between representatives of The Prince of Wales and the public authority would constitute an actionable breach of confidence.
129. However, before he can conclude that such correspondence is exempt from disclosure by virtue of section 41, the Commissioner must again consider whether there is a public interest defence to disclosing this information. Given the different nature of this information to the correspondence of a more private and personal nature, the Commissioner believes that the balance of public interest is slightly different from that considered above.
130. The public interest arguments in favour of disclosing this information still focus on issues identified above which are central to the Act, namely accountability and transparency of public authorities, furthering public debate and improving confidence in public authorities. However, the emphasis on these arguments in this context is less on how the public authority interacted with The Prince of Wales and actions it may have taken following such correspondence, and more on how the public authority interacted with His Royal Highness' representatives and actions its may have taken following such correspondence.
131. Similarly, whilst the public interest arguments at the heart of maintaining the confidence remain relevant, e.g. the strong public interest in protecting confidences, there is less emphasis on the public interest in protecting The Prince of Wales' ability to correspond privately with Ministers. The focus is more on the public interest in protecting his representatives' ability to correspond confidentially with government departments. In the Commissioner's opinion it is in the public interest that members of the Heir to the Throne's Household can correspond confidentially with government departments in order to ensure the efficient and effective interaction between the government of the day and a key part of The Royal Household.
132. Nevertheless, the Commissioner has to remember that disclosure of such information would require a strong set of public interest arguments and disclosure would have to be justified by the content of the withheld information itself not simply on the basis of generic or abstract public interest arguments.
133. The Commissioner has reviewed the content of the relevant correspondence carefully and he has reached the conclusion that despite the weight of the public interest arguments in favour of disclosure, the content does not indicate a sufficiently strong reason for this correspondence to be disclosed. Consequently, the Commissioner has concluded that there would not be a public interest defence if the correspondence that falls within the scope of section 41 was disclosed.
134. Having carefully reviewed the remainder of the requested information, the Commissioner, for reasons already explained above, and which are set out in more detail in the confidential annex, has concluded that this information is environmental information. He has therefore gone on to consider whether any of the exceptions cited under the EIR apply.

Regulation 12(5)(f) – interests of the person who provided the information

135. The public authority has argued that if the Commissioner finds that any of the withheld information constitutes 'environmental' information as defined by the EIR, it would seek to rely on the exceptions contained at regulations 12(5)(d), 12(5)(f) and 13(1). Again the Department's submission on why these exceptions applied focused on correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales rather than correspondence exchanged with His Royal Highness' representatives.
136. As the Commissioner has concluded that some of the information falling within the scope of this request is environmental information, he has considered the application of these exceptions, starting with 12(5)(f).
137. Regulation 12(5)(f) states:
- 'a public authority may refuse to disclose information to the extent that its disclosure would adversely affect –
- (f) the interests of the person who provided the information where that person –
- (i) was not under, and could not have been put under, any legal obligation to supply it to that or any other public authority;
 - (ii) did not supply it in circumstances such that that or any other public authority is entitled apart from these Regulations to disclose it; and
 - (iii) has not consented to its disclosure;'
138. The Commissioner is conscious that the threshold to engage an exception under regulation 12(5) of the EIR is a high one compared to the threshold needed to engage a prejudice based exemption under the Act:
- Under regulation 12(5) for information to be exempt it is not enough that disclosure of information will have an effect, that effect must be 'adverse'.
 - Refusal to disclose information is only permitted to the extent of that adverse effect – i.e. if an adverse effect would not result from disclosure of part of a particular document or piece of information, then that information should be disclosed.
 - It is necessary for the public authority to show that disclosure 'would' have an adverse effect, not that it may or simply could have an effect. With regard to the interpretation of the phrase 'would' the Commissioner has been influenced by the Tribunal's comments in the case Hogan v Oxford City Council & Information Commissioner (EA/2005/0026 & 0030) in which the Tribunal suggested that although it was not necessary for the public authority to prove that prejudice would occur beyond any doubt whatsoever, prejudice must be at least more probable than not.⁸

⁸ These guiding principles in relation to the engagement of exceptions contained at regulation 12(5) were set out in Tribunal case Archer v Information Commissioner & Salisbury District Council (EA/2006/0037)

139. Furthermore, the wording of the exception at regulation 12(5)(f) makes it clear that the adverse effect has to be to the person who provided the information rather than the public authority that holds the information.
140. As with section 41(1)(a), correspondence sent to the Department clearly falls within the scope of regulation 12(5)(f) because it was information 'provided' to it by a third party, i.e. The Prince of Wales or his representatives. Again, as with section 41(1)(a), the Commissioner also accepts that correspondence which the public authority sends to The Prince of Wales or his representatives can potentially fall within the scope of the exception at regulation 12(5)(f) if it sufficiently closely replicates the content of the information originally provided to it by His Royal Highness.
141. The Commissioner has carefully considered the environmental information which falls within the scope of this request and he is satisfied that it is contained within communications sent to the public authority by The Prince of Wales or his representatives and/or is contained within correspondence sent by the Department to The Prince of Wales or his representatives but is sufficiently focused on information originally provided to the Department.
142. Before considering the nature of the adverse effect, the Commissioner has considered whether the three limbs of 12(5)(f) are met. With regard to the first limb, the Commissioner accepts that neither The Prince of Wales nor his representatives were under any legal obligation to supply the information. Although it is an established tradition, and one protected by the convention discussed above, that the Heir to The Throne will communicate with government Ministers, he is under no legally binding obligation to do so. The Commissioner believes that the second limb will be met where there is no specific statutory power to disclose the information in question. It is clear that there is no such power in this case and thus the second limb is met. Finally with regard to the third limb the Commissioner understands that neither The Prince of Wales nor his representatives have consented to disclosure of the withheld information.
143. The nature of the adverse effect which the Department has argued would occur if The Prince of Wales' correspondence was disclosed effectively mirrors that discussed above in relation to the application of section 41. In essence, if the information were disclosed this would adversely harm The Prince of Wales because not only would it undermine his political neutrality but it would also have a chilling effect on the way in which he corresponds with government Ministers and thus impinge upon the established convention that he is able to correspond confidentially with government Ministers. Moreover, disclosure would impinge upon The Prince of Wales' privacy. For the reasons set out above the Commissioner accepts that disclosure of the correspondence with The Prince of Wales could have these effects. As indicated above in relation to section 41, the correspondence exchanged by the public authority with representatives of The Prince of Wales also includes the views and opinions of His Royal Highness. Therefore the Commissioner accepts that if such correspondence was disclosed this could also affect the Prince of Wales in the same way.

144. In relation to the likelihood of such effects occurring, the Commissioner believes that the higher threshold of 'would occur' is met. This is because there a number of ways in which the adverse effect could manifest itself: it could be to his privacy, dignity, political neutrality and/or the practical way in which he actually corresponds with government Ministers. Furthermore, it is clear that The Prince of Wales communicates with Ministers across government, rather than simply to one or two departments, thus the likelihood of the adverse effect occurring is increased.
145. The Commissioner therefore accepts that regulation 12(5)(f) is engaged for both correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales and for correspondence exchanged with representatives of His Royal Highness. However all exceptions contained within the EIR are qualified and therefore the Commissioner must consider the public interest test set out at regulation 12(1)(b). This test is effectively the same as the test set out in section 2 of the Act and states that information may only be withheld if the public interest in maintaining the exception outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information. Regulation 12(2) states explicitly that a public authority must apply a presumption in favour of disclosure.

Public interest arguments in favour of maintaining the exception

146. The Department argued that the prime reason why the exemption should be maintained is in order to ensure that the confidentiality essential to the two conventions discussed above is not undermined. The Department explained that it was strongly in the public interest that these conventions were not undermined as to do so would result in The Prince of Wales, who in due course would become Monarch, losing his political neutrality. Preserving the political neutrality of the Royal Family was essential to ensuring the stability of the constitutional Monarchy (for the reasons set out in relation to section 41 above), an outcome which was clearly in the public interest.
147. Furthermore the Department argued that disclosure of the information could lead to a chilling effect in respect of The Prince of Wales, and those he corresponds with, altering the manner in which they communicate, for example by comments no longer being recorded or the nature in the which the comments are recorded being of a less free and frank nature. Such an effect would not be in the public interest because it would result in The Prince of Wales being less prepared for the business of government when he is Monarch and furthermore might undermine His Royal Highness' ability to carry out his role as a Privy Councillor, a Counsellor of State and any duties he may be called upon to undertake in line with the Regency Act 1937.
148. The Department has also argued that disclosure of this information may also have a wider chilling effect because it could deter other private individuals from contacting the government if they felt their correspondence would be disclosed under the Act. The public authority has argued that it is in the public interest that anyone should feel free to correspond with members of the government on any subject matter and that such an input has been a valuable source of information about the public's view on many matters. Consequently, a valuable channel of communication of between government and governed could break down to great public detriment. Not only would the government lose access to otherwise unreachable ideas, citizens deprived of this long-established channel for expressing opinions to our leaders could come to feel alienated from government.

149. The Department also argued that given the broad scope of section regulation 12(5)(f), the public interest extended to protecting the privacy and the dignity of the Royal Family. It would not be in the public interest if disclosure of the withheld information infringed this privacy.

Public interest arguments in favour of disclosing the requested information

150. The Commissioner believes that the public interest arguments in favour of disclosing this information mirror those set out above under the consideration of section 41 and thus he has not repeated them here.

Balance of the public interest arguments for communications with The Prince of Wales

151. The Commissioner believes that the following four public interest factors can be said to be inherent in the maintaining the exemption and relevant to the correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales:
- Protecting the ability of the Sovereign to exercise her right to consult, to encourage and to warn her Government and to preserve her position of political neutrality;
 - Protecting the ability of the Heir to the Throne to be instructed in the business of government in preparation for when he is King and in connection with existing constitutional duties, whilst preserving his own position of political neutrality and that of the Sovereign;
 - Preserving the political neutrality of the Royal Family and particularly the Sovereign and the Heir to the Throne to ensure the stability of the constitutional Monarchy; and
 - Protecting the privacy and dignity of the Royal Family.
152. As noted above in his analysis of the application of section 41, the Commissioner believes that the scope of the constitutional convention in respect of the Heir to the Throne is relatively narrow. That is to say it will only cover correspondence in which The Prince of Wales is in fact being educated in the ways and workings of government; it cannot be interpreted so widely as to encompass all of The Prince of Wales' communications with the government, i.e. it does not cover correspondence in which His Royal Highness may be discussing his charitable work or indeed information of particularly personal nature (this is not to say of course that the withheld information in this case includes examples of either class of information).
153. However, where the information does fall within the Commissioner's definition of this convention, he accepts that there is a significant and weighty public interest in preserving the operation of this convention, i.e. it would not be in the public interest that the operation of the established confidential convention would be undermined. This is particularly so given that the convention is designed to

- protect communications at the heart of government, i.e. the Heir to the Throne and government Ministers. The significant weight which protecting the convention attracts can be seen correctly seen as akin to the strong weight applied to maintaining the exemption in contained at section 42 as it will always be strongly in the public interest to protect legal professional privilege.
154. The Commissioner also accepts that it is logical to argue that disclosure of the information covered by the convention could undermine The Prince of Wales' political neutrality for the reasons advanced by the public authority. The Commissioner believes that significant weight should be attributed to the argument that disclosure would undermine The Prince of Wales' political neutrality: it is clearly in the public interest that The Prince of Wales, either as Heir to the Throne or when Monarch, is not perceived to be politically biased in order to protect his position as Sovereign in a constitutional democracy.
155. Vitally, the Commissioner believes that arguments concerning political neutrality are still relevant, and indeed attract similar weight, even when the information being withheld does not fall within the scope of the constitutional convention relating to the Heir to the Throne. In other words disclosure of correspondence not strictly on issues related to the business of government could still lead to The Prince of Wales being perceived as having particular political views or preferences and thus could undermine his political neutrality.
156. Turning to the chilling effect arguments, as the public authority correctly suggests, such arguments are directly concerned with the loss of frankness and candour in debate and advice which would flow from the disclosure of information. Such arguments can encompass a number of related scenarios:
- Disclosing information about a given policy or decision making process, whilst that particular process is ongoing, will be likely to affect the frankness and candour with which relevant parties will make future contributions to that policy/decision making;
 - The idea that disclosing information about a given policy or decision making process, whilst that process is ongoing, will be likely to affect the frankness and candour with which relevant parties will contribute to other future, different, policy debates and decision making processes; and
 - Finally an even broader scenario where disclosing information relating to the formulation and development of a given policy or decision making process (even after the process is complete), will be likely to affect the frankness and candour with which relevant parties will contribute to other future, different, policy debates and decision making processes.
157. In the Commissioner's opinion all three scenarios are potentially relevant here. Some of the withheld information can be seen to relate to discussions on issues where the policy debate or decision making can still be seen as 'live', e.g. where a government position has yet to be finalised, and some of the information can be said to relate to decisions which have been taken.
158. With regard to attributing weight to the argument that disclosure of the withheld information would have a chilling effect on the way in which The Prince of Wales and/or government Ministers would correspond, the Commissioner believes that it is difficult to make an assessment of such an argument given the unique nature of this relationship and thus the lack of any clear precedents, e.g. previous disclosures under the Act of similar information.

159. However, the Commissioner is aware of the authorised biography of The Prince of Wales by Jonathan Dimbleby which was published in 1994.⁹ In his introduction to this publication, Dimbleby explains that The Prince of Wales provided him with access to His Royal Highness' archives at St James's Place and Windsor Castle. Dimbleby therefore had access to The Prince of Wales' journals, papers and correspondence between with Whitehall. In relation to the inclusion of such information in his book Dimbleby explains that:

'I have been persuaded that the verbatim publication of the material might have a deleterious effect either on the conduct of British diplomacy or on the confidential nature of communications between the monarchy and Whitehall or Westminster; in these cases I have either withheld information or paraphrased the relevant documents or correspondence. However, when it was obvious that only the culture of secrecy which pervades Whitehall was under threat and not the conduct of good governance, I have not complied with requests to delete pertinent material'.

160. Therefore, it would clearly be incorrect to argue that details of Prince of Wales' communications with government have never been placed in the public domain. To take but two examples from The Prince of Wales: A Biography, at page 582 Dimbleby quotes from a letter sent by His Royal Highness in 1985 to the then Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, in addition to quoting from a draft section of the letter which did not make the final version. And at page 809 Dimbleby notes that The Prince of Wales wrote to the then Secretary of State for Defence, Malcolm Rifkind, about the implications of cutting the Army's manpower and quotes from the this letter. Although the quote is not particularly lengthy in nature it clearly shows The Prince of Wales' strong views on this issue. The Commissioner has not been provided with any evidence by the public authority that the inclusion of details of The Prince of Wales' correspondence in this book has resulted in any sort of the chilling effect.
161. However, the Commissioner accepts that a direct parallel cannot be drawn between the disclosure of the withheld information which is the focus of this case and the previous disclosures such as the Dimbleby biography. To some extent, as Dimbleby himself acknowledges, his book was been 'self-censored': extracts have not been included that would undermine the confidential nature of communications between the monarchy. In contrast, disclosure of the withheld information in this case would be without the consent of The Prince of Wales and would result in complete copies, as opposed to extracts or paraphrased sections, of correspondence being revealed.
162. Furthermore the Commissioner believes that an inherent part of the convention is the ability of both the Heir to the Throne and government ministers to be free and

⁹ J Dimbleby, The Prince of Wales: A Biography, (Bath: Chivers Press, 1994)

- frank when discussing matters of government business. This is to ensure that the Heir to the Throne is instructed in the business of government in the most effective and efficient way possible. In the Commissioner's opinion, disclosure of information falling within the scope of convention would lead The Prince of Wales, and possibly the government minister with whom he corresponds, to feel constrained or more reluctant to take part in the process of being educated about the business of government. Therefore, given the protection which the Commissioner believes should be provided to the convention itself, it follows that notable weight should be given to the argument that disclosure of information which falls within the scope of the convention would result in a chilling effect.
163. With regard to attributing weight to the chilling effect arguments for correspondence which does not fall within the scope of the convention, the Commissioner does not believe that such arguments automatically attract weight in the way in which correspondence falling within the convention does. Rather, the assessment as to whether a chilling effect will occur will be based upon factors considered in other cases involving an assessment of the chilling effect, most notably the content of the information itself. This because in the Commissioner's opinion in order for a chilling effect argument to be convincing the information which is disclosed has to be more than anodyne in nature otherwise disclosure of such information is unlikely to dissuade individuals from making frank and candid comments in the future. In the circumstances of this case the Commissioner accepts that the correspondence which is not covered by the chilling effect is of a relatively frank and candid nature and thus some weight should be attributed to the argument that disclosure of this information would result in a chilling effect in the way in which The Prince of Wales drafts his correspondence.
164. Again, as with the concept of political neutrality, the Commissioner accepts that a chilling effect on the nature of correspondence falling within the convention could occur even if the withheld information does fall within the scope of the convention. That is to say, disclosure of information on topics not associated with the business of government, would still be likely to affect future correspondence not simply on similar topics but also on topics falling within the scope of the convention.
165. However, the Commissioner is not prepared to accept that disclosure of this information would have a chilling effect on the way in which other individuals contact the government. In the Commissioner's opinion it is not a logical to suggest that because some of The Prince Wales' correspondence with government is disclosed, private individuals would fear that their correspondence would also be disclosed. Clearly, if The Prince of Wales' correspondence was disclosed in response to a request submitted under the Act and/or the EIR, despite the strong protection afforded to it by sections 41 and regulation 12(5)(f) (and by implication the effect of the constitutional convention and Article 8 ECHR) it would be obvious that disclosure would be necessary to satisfy a significant and distinct public interest. This interest would almost inevitably be related to the position that His Royal Highness holds rather than simply the content of the information itself. Consequently, the Commissioner believes that the public would be perfectly capable of distinguishing between the government disclosing specific

- pieces of correspondence with The Prince of Wales (and moreover only disclosing such information after a request under the Act and/or in response to a section 50 Notice) and the potential disclosure of information which they may send to the government in their role as private citizens. Without any evidence to the contrary, and bearing in mind the comments of the Tribunal referenced above, the Commissioner believes that such an argument does not attract any particular weight.
166. With regard to the final argument, i.e. the privacy considerations contained within regulation 12(5)(f), the Commissioner believes that these should not be dismissed lightly. There is a clear public interest in protecting the dignity of the Royal Family so as to preserve their position and ability to fulfil their constitutional role as a unifying symbol for the nation. To the extent that disclosure of the withheld information would undermine His Royal Highness' dignity by invasion of his privacy, the Commissioner accepts that this adds further weight to maintaining the exemption.
 167. The Commissioner believes that his position in relation to the weight that should be attributed to the public interest arguments in favour of disclosing this information are clearly set out in relation to the comments above in section 41.
 168. Again, in reaching a conclusion about where the balance of the public interest lies the Commissioner has to focus on the specific content of the information. In this case for the information which falls within the scope of the convention, the Commissioner believes that the public interest in maintaining the exemption is very strong because of the weight that should be attributed to maintaining the convention – i.e. a confidential space in which the Heir to the Throne can communicate with Ministers - and the concepts which underpin it, i.e. political neutrality and confidentiality, along with the weight that should be given to the chilling effect arguments for such correspondence. Even when taken together the Commissioner does not feel that the public interest arguments in favour of disclosing the particular information which falls within the scope of this request overrides this weighty public interest in maintaining the exemption.
 169. In relation to any of the information which may fall outside the Commissioner's definition of the convention, the Commissioner believes that the public interest is more finely balanced because the argument in favour of maintaining a constitutional convention attracts far less weight. (It should not be inferred that such information is indeed contained within the scope of this request.) Therefore, it would certainly be possible (and easier) to envisage a scenario where disclosure of the correspondence between The Prince of Wales and government Ministers would be in the public interest. However, as noted above just because information does not fall within the scope of the convention this does not mean that its disclosure would not undermine two key concepts inherent to it: political neutrality and the potential to have a chilling effect on future correspondence. Moreover, having once again considered the content of the withheld information in this case the Commissioner believes that the public interest favours maintaining the exemption.

Balance of public interest arguments for correspondence with representatives of The Prince of Wales and the Department.

170. Given the different nature of this correspondence to the correspondence exchanged with The Prince of Wales the Commissioner believes that the weight that should be attributed to the various public interest arguments differs slightly.
171. In the Commissioner's opinion disclosure of this correspondence would be unlikely to have any particular chilling effect on the way in which The Prince of Wales exchanged correspondence with public authorities in the future. Similarly the Commissioner does not believe that disclosure of this correspondence would directly affect the confidentiality of correspondence which the Heir to the Throne exchanged with Ministers, which would fall within the scope of the convention.
172. However, the Commissioner believes that the arguments surrounding political neutrality and the privacy and dignity of The Royal Family are still relevant. This is because, as discussed above, the correspondence held by the public authority which has been exchanged with the representatives of The Prince of Wales includes references to His Royal Highness' views and opinions; in many cases the correspondence sent by representatives were clearly sent on behalf of The Prince of Wales.
173. Furthermore, whilst the Commissioner believes that the public interest arguments identified above in favour of disclosure, whilst being central to any public interest balance, should only attract weight to the extent that disclosure of the withheld information itself would serve those interests. Having considered the content of the remaining withheld information the Commissioner does not believe that its disclosure would significantly meet the public interest arguments identified above and in any case not sufficiently so to outweigh the public interest in maintaining the exemption, given the weight that should be attributed to political neutrality and the privacy and dignity of the Heir to The Throne.
174. Therefore the Commissioner is satisfied that, for the reasons set out above, the public interest in disclosing the withheld information is outweighed by the public interest in maintaining the exception provided by regulation 12(5)(f). In light of this decision, he has not gone to consider the applicability of regulations 12(5)(d) and 13.

The requests for a list of approaches and number of approaches

175. In addition to asking for copies of correspondence and internal documentation, the complainant also sought a list of approaches, along with the number of approaches, made by The Prince of Wales or other individuals representing His Royal Highness to the Department. The complainant specified that such a list should include 'details of the nature of the approach and the issues involved'.
176. The Department has argued that disclosure of such a list, and by implication the number of approaches, is exempt from disclosure on the basis of sections 37(1)(a), 40(2) and 41(1).

177. In relation to section 41, the Department argued that disclosure of the details of the approaches made to the Department clearly constituted information which was provided to it by a third party and thus met the requirements of section 41(1)(a). As to why disclosure of this would constitute an actionable breach, the [name of PA] referred to the arguments set out above in relation to the application of section 41(1)(b) to copies of the letters sent by The Prince of Wales to the Department
178. In relation to the application of section 37(1)(a), the Department explained that whilst it is publicly acknowledged that The Prince of Wales corresponds on occasion with government, it is not generally known when and with whom he corresponds. Disclosure of such information, i.e. by providing a list and/or schedule of the correspondence falling within the scope of this request would not be in the public interest because disclosure of the details of when and with whom His Royal Highness corresponds, even in the absence of disclosure of the subject matter of the correspondence, would lead to damaging speculation about the nature of that correspondence. Inferences would be drawn, whether warranted or not, from the knowledge that The Prince of Wales had written a certain number of times to a government department within a particular period, that he had written on particular topics or had expressed particular views. That in turn would inhibit His Royal Highness and Ministers from exchanging views on governmental matters which would inhibit the convention that the Heir to the Throne should be instructed in business of government. Again the public authority noted that the reasons for the application of section 41(1) overlap and support the application of section 37(1)(a).
179. The Department argued that these public interest concerns should be given particular weight even without the need to demonstrate particular prejudice arising from these particular lists; section 37(1)(a) applied without proof of damage. To support this point the the Department suggested that there was a strong parallel to be drawn between this case and HM Treasury v Information Commissioner and Evan Owen [2009] EWHC 1811. This case, like the present case, concerned a narrow and specific exemption: in that case, the exemption related to the advice of Law Officers under section 35(1)(c). The Department highlighted the fact that Blake J held that the general public interest considerations behind non-disclosure, which are reflected in section 35(1)(c), should be taken into account in the absence of proof of damage. This was why Parliament had enacted the specific exemption for Law Officers' advice under section 35(1)(c) without requiring proof of damage. The public authority argued that same considerations applied in the context of this case.
180. In addition to this point the Department highlighted to the Commissioner a particular instance where a particular public authority had disclosed the number of times The Prince of Wales had contacted it and the harm this had caused to His Royal Highness' position, and in particular his political neutrality. (The Commissioner does not consider it appropriate to include details of this in the main body of the Notice).
181. Having considered the arguments advanced by the Department very carefully the Commissioner has concluded that a list of approaches, along with the number of approaches made by The Prince of Wales and/or His Royal Highness' representatives is exempt from disclosure on the basis of section 41(1). The Commissioner accepts that disclosure of this information would constitute an actionable breach of confidence broadly for the reasons the Commissioner has set out above with regard to the application of section 41(1) to the correspondence itself. Although the Commissioner acknowledges that disclosure simply of a list of approaches and/or details of the number of such approaches would result in less information being placed into the public domain, the Commissioner still believes that this would constitute an infringement into The Prince of Wales' right of privacy under Article 8 ECHR. For the reasons set out above the Commissioner does not believe that there is a sufficient public interest defence to warrant disclosure of this information.

182. The Commissioner is conscious of the fact that disclosure of the number of approaches in this case could be used, along with disclosure of similar information in the future, to build up a relatively complete picture of which departments The Prince of Wales corresponds most frequently with. Furthermore the nature of the requests in this case are relatively specific; they do not simply seek the overall number of approaches between The Prince of Wales and his Household and the public authority. Rather the complainant has specifically requested the number of approaches made by The Prince of Wales to the certain areas/individuals with the Department and similarly the number of approaches by representatives of The Prince of Wales to the certain areas/individuals with the public authority..
183. The Commissioner notes that with regard to the part of the schedule requested by the complainant which would include a brief description of each document, if the documents contained environmental information, as some of the correspondence in this case does, any description of the environmental information contained within the documents would in itself constitute environmental information. However, the Commissioner believes that the parts of such a schedule would be exempt from disclosure either on the basis of regulation 12(5)(f) for the same reasons set out above in relation to the application of section 41(1) to the non-environmental information.

Procedural Requirements

184. Under section 17(1) of the Act, a Department which intends to rely on any provision of the Act relating to an exemption from the duty to confirm or deny if information is held (in accordance with section 1(1)(a)) must do so within 20 working days following a request.
185. The Commissioner therefore finds the Department in breach of section 17(1) for responding to the complainant's request of 22 February 2006 on 28 July 2006, 5 months after the request was made.
186. Section 17(1)(b) additionally provides that a Department which intends to rely on an exemption(s) from the disclosure of information following a request(s) must do so within 20 working days.

187. In light of the Department's late reliance on the exemptions at sections 41 and 37(1)(a), the Commissioner also finds the public authority in breach of section 17(1)(b).
188. For the same reason, the Commissioner finds the Department in breach of the equivalent provision in regulation 14(2) of the EIR for the late reliance on the exception at regulation 12(5)(f).

The Decision

189. The Commissioner's decision is that the Department dealt with the following elements of the request in accordance with the requirements of the Act:

The Department correctly withheld some of the information held on the basis regulation 12(5)(f) and the remainder was correctly withheld on the basis of section 41.

190. However, the Commissioner has also decided that the following elements of the request were not dealt with in accordance with the Act:

The Department breached sections 17(1) and 17(1)(b) for the late reliance on the exemptions from the duty to confirm or deny if requested information is held and the duty to disclose the requested information.

The Department also breached the equivalent provision in regulation 14(2) of the EIR for the late reliance on the exception at regulation 12(5)(f).

Steps Required

191. The Commissioner requires no steps to be taken.

Freedom of Information Act 2000

Refusal of Request

Section 17(1) provides that -

“A public authority which, in relation to any request for information, is to any extent relying on a claim that any provision of Part II relating to the duty to confirm or deny is relevant to the request or on a claim that information is exempt information must, within the time for complying with section 1(1), give the applicant a notice which -

- (a) states that fact,
- (b) specifies the exemption in question, and
- (c) states (if that would not otherwise be apparent) why the exemption applies.”

Section 17(2) states –

“Where–

- (a) in relation to any request for information, a public authority is, as respects any information, relying on a claim-
 - (i) that any provision of part II which relates to the duty to confirm or deny and is not specified in section 2(3) is relevant to the request, or
 - (ii) that the information is exempt information only by virtue of a provision not specified in section 2(3), and
- (b) at the time when the notice under subsection (1) is given to the applicant, the public authority (or, in a case falling within section 66(3) or (4), the responsible authority) has not yet reached a decision as to the application of subsection (1)(b) or (2)(b) of section 2, the notice under subsection (1) must indicate that no decision as to the application of that provision has yet been reached and must contain an estimate of the date by which the authority expects that such a decision will have been reached.”

Section 17(3) provides that -

“A public authority which, in relation to any request for information, is to any extent relying on a claim that subsection (1)(b) or (2)(b) of section 2 applies must, either in the notice under subsection (1) or in a separate notice given within such time as is reasonable in the circumstances, state the reasons for claiming -

(a) that, in all the circumstances of the case, the public interest in maintaining the exclusion of the duty to confirm or deny outweighs the public interest in disclosing whether the authority holds the information, or

(b) that, in all the circumstances of the case, the public interest in maintaining the exemption outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information.”

Section 17(4) provides that -

- (a) the public authority is relying on a claim that section 14 applies,
- (b) the authority has given the applicant a notice, in relation to a previous request for information, stating that it is relying on such a claim, and
- (c) it would in all the circumstances be unreasonable to expect the authority to serve a further notice under subsection (5) in relation to the current request.”

Section 17(7) provides that –

“A notice under section (1), (3) or (5) must –

- (a) contain particulars of any procedure provided by the public authority for dealing with complaints about the handling of requests for information or state that the authority does not provide such a procedure, and

Section 41(2) provides that –

“The duty to confirm or deny does not arise if, or to the extent that, the confirmation or denial that would have to be given to comply with section 1(1)(a) would (apart from this Act) constitute an actionable breach of confidence

Environmental Information Regulations 2004

Regulation 12 - Exceptions to the duty to disclose environmental information

Regulation 12(1) Subject to paragraphs (2), (3) and (9), a public authority may refuse to disclose environmental information requested if –

- (a) an exception to disclosure applies under paragraphs (4) or (5); and
- (b) in all the circumstances of the case, the public interest in maintaining the exception outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information.

Regulation 12(2) A public authority shall apply a presumption in favour of disclosure.

Regulation 12(3) To the extent that the information requested includes personal data of which the applicant is not the data subject, the personal data shall not be disclosed otherwise than in accordance with regulation 13.

Regulation 12(4) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(a), a public authority may refuse to disclose information to the extent that –

- (a) it does not hold that information when an applicant’s request is received;
- (b) the request for information is manifestly unreasonable;
- (c) the request for information is formulated in too general a manner and the public authority has complied with regulation 9;
- (d) the request relates to material which is still in course of completion, to unfinished documents or to incomplete data; or
- (e) the request involves the disclosure of internal communications.

Regulation 12(5) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(a), a public authority may refuse to disclose information to the extent that its disclosure would adversely affect –

- (a) international relations, defence, national security or public safety;
- (b) the course of justice, the ability of a person to receive a fair trial or the ability of a public authority to conduct an inquiry of a criminal or disciplinary nature;
- (c) intellectual property rights;
- (d) the confidentiality of the proceedings of that or any other public authority where such confidentiality is provided by law;

- (e) the confidentiality of commercial or industrial information where such confidentiality is provided by law to protect a legitimate economic interest;
- (f) the interests of the person who provided the information where that person –
 - (i) was not under, and could not have been put under, any legal obligation to supply it to that or any other public authority;
 - (ii) did not supply it in circumstances such that that or any other public authority is entitled apart from these Regulations to disclose it; and
 - (iii) has not consented to its disclosure; or
- (g) the protection of the environment to which the information relates.

Regulation 12(6) For the purpose of paragraph (1), a public authority may respond to a request by neither confirming or denying whether such information exists and is held by the public authority, whether or not it holds such information, if that confirmation or denial would involve the disclosure of information which would adversely affect any of the interests referred to in paragraph (5)(a) and would not be in the public interest under paragraph (1)(b).

Regulation 12(7) For the purposes of a response under paragraph (6), whether information exists and is held by the public authority is itself the disclosure of information.

Regulation 12(8) For the purposes of paragraph (4)(e), internal communications includes communications between government departments.

Regulation 12(9) To the extent that the environmental information to be disclosed relates to information on emissions, a public authority shall not be entitled to refuse to disclose that information under an exception referred to in paragraphs (5)(d) to (g).

Regulation 12(10) For the purpose of paragraphs (5)(b), (d) and (f), references to a public authority shall include references to a Scottish public authority.

Regulation 12(11) Nothing in these Regulations shall authorise a refusal to make available any environmental information contained in or otherwise held with other information which is withheld by virtue of these Regulations unless it is not reasonably capable of being separated from the other information for the purpose of making available that information.

Regulation 14 - Refusal to disclose information

Regulation 14(1) If a request for environmental information is refused by a public authority under regulations 12(1) or 13(1), the refusal shall be made in writing and comply with the following provisions of this regulation.
